The Extent to Which Constitution's Subjects and Forms Are Affected
By the Attitudes and Powers of Makers
A Comparative Study

*Ahmad A. Al-Naqshabandi **

ABSTRACT

This paper deals with the content of the constitution including its essential components and superior regulatory rules governing state and society.

The study first explains language and technical significations of (constitution) as a term, then demonstrates and evaluates the two criteria of formative and subjective to draw out what is exactly meant by (constitution), with a review to arguments by some French and Arab jurists.

I then studied traditional forms of constitution, including written, unwritten, rigid, flexible; modern forms, including brief, elaborated, derivative, original, unitary and federal constitutions.

The study articulates the phenomenon of (Ourself the People), which most often cited in preambles of various old and recent constitutions, the reason why they were cited according to variety jurists, and demonstrates who is the (People) and what is its real part in constitution making process.

To better understand the constitution and its very content, it would be essential to consider how influential were the attitudes and powers of constitution's makers to identify their real aims and interests in doing so, particularly, in the United States and some Third World countries.

Keywords: the Essential content (The Constitution), Forms of the Constitution, The Aims Behind Setting the Constitution.
